New chance for peace

In the last few weeks, with the signing and approval of the new peace deal between the Colombian Government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), the country took crucial steps in the direction of peace. In a ceremony more discrete than the one held in Cartagena in September, on November 24 the parties signed the new deal in the Colón Theater, in Bogotá, in front of 800 guests. The signing was held in the presence of victims of the conflict, ambassadors of different countries, ex-presidents, high judges, members of Congress and representatives of civil society. On the occasion, the top leader of the guerrilla, Rodrigo “Timochenko” Londoño Echeverría, expressed his solidarity to all victims of the conflict and vowed that from now on “the word will be the only weapon used by Colombians”. President Santos, for his part, also celebrated the final agreement and signaled that he will enlist “all political parties, all sectors of society to participate, contribute and achieve, in this manner, a great national consensus for the implementation of peace”.

The method for ratifying the new agreement – a vote in Congress – was revealed days before the signing. In an official statement, the President said that he was in a hurry and justified his choice by raising concern with the fragility of the ceasefire (see Radar n. 22) and with the growth of violence directed towards social movements’ leaders. On November 21, in an open letter to the President, FARC asked for concrete measures regarding the 200 social activists already killed this year in Colombia. Santos said he feared the polarization that another referendum would cause and defended the legitimacy of the congressional mechanism as representative of the popular vote and Colombian departments. In view of this, he concluded that “after hearing all the proposals and alternatives, and in agreement with FARC, it is clear that the most convenient and legitimate way to ratify this new agreement is by means of the Congress of the Republic, where all political viewpoints and options of the country are represented, from the extreme left to the extreme right”.

Amid protests by opposition leaders, still in favor of a popular vote, the agreement was sent to Congress immediately after the signing by the parties. On November 29, the agreement was ratified by the Senate by 75 votes to 0. The session, which lasted over 12 hours, included interventions by the chief negotiator of the government, Humberto de la Calle, by leaders of the “Yes” and “No” campaigns, and by dozens of senators. On the following day, by 130 votes to 0, the House of Representatives equally gave its approval to the agreement. The representatives of the Democratic Center party abstained from both votes.

With the approval, on December 1 the “D-Day” inaugurated the timetable for the demobilization of FARC. On the following day, the Commission for the Follow-up, Impulse and Verification of the Peace Agreement and the National Council for Reintegration were installed. The Commission will be charged with accompanying the advances in implementation, and will be made up of leaders of the Havana negotiations. The Council will be responsible for guaranteeing the implementation of the rehabilitation of the ex-guerillas, and will have two members of each party – Pastor Alape and Jairo Quintero will represent FARC, and the members of the government yet to be confirmed. In a controversial debate, moreover, the Constitutional Court will decide in the coming days on the validity of the fast track method for the approval of measures regarding the implementation of the agreement, a mechanism introduced by the Legislative Act for Peace that is considered fundamental by the government.

Venezuela Political Dialogue and Multilateral Impasses

Venezuela is in the middle of an important moment of the dialogue between government and opposition (see Radars n. 21 and 22). The process is currently facilitated by the Vatican and the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) and has resulted, so far, in two meetings discussing the negotiation of possible democratic exits from the current crisis. On November 23, the Venezuelan President Nicolás Maduro met with the

Radar GSUM

nº 23 | De 19 de novembro a 4 de dezembro de 2016

ex-President of Spain, José Luis Zapatero, one of the mediators of dialogue. During the conversation, Maduro confirmed that “the government will remain firm in the process”.

This statement was made on the same day that Henrique Capriles, member of the opposition party Popular Will (VP) and former presidential candidate, said that Maduro had removed himself from the negotiations. This claim was backed up by a comment made by opposition politician Jesús Torrealba, member of the coalition Table of Democratic Unity (MUD), who told the news agency Reuters that “the government, in an irresponsible way, froze the process by not showing up to two technical meetings”.

The next phase of the dialogue process is arranged for December 6, which is also the deadline for the government to show compliance with terms determined in the agreement. Jesús Torrealba stated that “on November 30 it marks one month since the first meeting of the negotiation table and [so far] the government has not completed its side of the deal”. According to the “Living in Peace” statement released on November 12, one of tasks attributed to both parts would be “to overcome economic hardships [and combat] insecurity and criminal violence”. Going further, MUD also informed that in the event that the government shows no commitment to what has been agreed by the date of the next meeting, the opposition coalition will no longer attend negotiations.

Another event that ended up adding to the scenario of political instability in Venezuela was the attempt of the VP party to advance a “democratic exit from the crisis”. On December 1, the party requested that the National Assembly (AN) of Venezuela move forward in trying the President of the country for abandonment of duty. VP said that it is necessary “to find a faster way to remove Nicolás Maduro through a constitutional path, in which the people can vote and decide”.

One of the most notable facts of recent weeks, however, was the attempt to expel Venezuela from MERCOSUR. On December 2, by means of a statement issued by the Foreign Ministry of Argentina, the Foreign Ministers of Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay determined that Venezuela “terminate its exercise of the rights inherent in the status of MERCOSUL member state”. According to the statement, Venezuela was unable to comply with the requirements defined by the Protocol of Accession of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.

In response, by means of a communiqué, Venezuela stated that the decision imposed a fraudulent suspension of the rights of the Venezuelan state. In the same statement, the government called the suspension a “serious illegal act”. According to the country, this sanction has no legal validity, as it lacked an express legal procedure and a collegial body competent to decide on expulsion. In addition, Venezuela claims to have incorporated 95% of the standards required for membership in four years. According to the government, this incorporation has been done more efficiently by Venezuela than by the other member countries of the regional bloc.

Despite the animosity between Venezuela and the founding countries of MERCOSUR, the Uruguayan chancellery has made itself available to talk to the Venezuelan government. Tabaré Vázquez confirmed that “the Uruguayan government and the President always choose dialogue and the exchange of ideas”, therefore, “nothing is irreversible, everything can change, [as long as there are] legal grounds”.
